So Hippokalos had left us. We turned back toward the citadel, crossed the wooden bridge that was raised at night, passed unhindered beneath the tall gate, and found ourselves inside. There was still an inner wall, not very high, beyond which the very city began – a densely populated place. The narrow streets, paved with stones worn smooth over time by the footsteps of its inhabitants, were full of life. The cramped wooden houses, the heavy smells of animals and sweating human bodies, the constant noise, the quarrelsome crowd – all of it shocked me. I had never seen such congestion and disorder. Women, men and children in long, ragged clothes stained with dirt were running back and forth, as though that were the very purpose of their entire lives.
